This week's poem gives us a gentle reminder that new beginnings are woven into the world we see each day.

"Again"

There is a quiet miracle in morning light, in the way the world begins again
without asking our permission.

A bud unfolds—
no announcement, no applause—just colour breaking through where yesterday there was none.

Lambs find their feet
on uncertain legs,
stumbling into fields
as if learning joy for the first time.

A bird lifts from the hedgerow,
not wondering if it will fly—
just trusting the air will hold it.

And somewhere,
in a room filled with soft voices,
a child takes its first breath—
and the whole world shifts to make space for that life.

We call these ordinary things.

But they are not ordinary.

They are reminders—
written into leaf and wing and breath—
that endings are not the final word.

That life has a way
of rising quietly, persistently,
where we least expect it.

That what seems still is often only waiting.

And if you listen closely enough,
you may hear it whispered
through all creation:

"See, I am making all things new."
